K - Paul's Louisiana Kitchen | Courtyard

As one of the original kings of Creole cooking, Paul Prudhomme still weaves his culinary magic at this upscale (but not stuffy) French Quarter staple. Executive chef Paul Miller delivers Cajun fare with big flavors and honest ingredients. The service is first class, and though the open kitchens on both floors of the circa-1830s townhouse can be boisterous at times, the cooks put on a great show for diners that offers warmth and authenticity. Chef Prudhomme is known for putting the down-home into Creole cooking. His restaurant offers that same homey feel with bold authenticity.

Court of Two Sisters

Though 613 Rue Royale is named for Emma and Bertha Camors, sisters who once owned a notions and fancies shop here, the Court of the Two Sisters has a long and interesting history. The lovely three-story building sits on "Governor's Row," the 600 block of Royal Street that was once home to five governors, two state Supreme Court justices, a future justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, and a future President of the United States. 613's own resident was Sieur Etienne de Perier, the royal governor of colonial Louisiana between 1726 and 1733. Such a famous block lent itself to rumors, and it's said that the outrageous Marquis de Vaudreuil—the colonial governor who turned New Orleans from marshland into a "petit Paris"—also once lived here.
